Birdseed Quick Tips

Food for backyard birds is typically offered in mixes, and the best backyard birdseed mixes have a strong black oil sunflower seed base. Always try to purchase a blend that is mostly dark in color; that is a sign that the mix has mostly black oil sunflower seeds.

Beware of birdseed blends in packages that don't allow you to see the contents, especially if they are at an unbelievably low price. The mix could be full of debris or filler seeds, like wheat and milo, which will not attract a wide variety of backyard birds. The best all-purpose mix will usually be 75% sunflower, 10% white millet, 10% safflower and 5% peanuts, much like our best-selling Featherfields' Feast.

Unless you want to attract ducks, turkeys and pigeons, avoid birdseed mixes that are mostly yellow. That might mean the mix could be filled with less popular grains to lower the price.

If you live in a condo or apartment, you might want to try a "no mess" blend. Our Garden Friendly blend contains seeds out of the shell, including hulled sunflower, peanuts and steel-cut corn.
